Objectives

The student should be able to describe concepts of stress and the historical development of scientific stress research. The student should be able to discuss how stress is manifested in physical and mental ill health and how stress may be caused by work-life conditions and other social factors. The student should be able to reflect critically on prevention programs and strategies aimed at preventing stress-related ill-health.

Content

The course gives an overview of the history and conceptual frame of contemporary stress research. The association between physiologically measurable stress and mental ill-health is one focus, as is the prevention of stress and stress-related mental ill health. Lectures address the associations between stress and physical health and illness as well as those between work conditions and other social factors and stress.

Teaching methods

Lectures followed by time for working with individual assignments or by seminars on the central topics of the course.

Examination

Active participation in lectures and seminars is required. In addition students are required to present assignments in seminars, orally or in written form. The course concludes with a comprehensive home assignment in which the student is asked to discuss the emergence and prevention of stress and stress-related ill health.

Transitional provisions

The course is cancelled. Examination under the syllabus is offered until Spring 2012 for students who do not complete the course successfully
